Brand new look for world-class collection of Greek and Roman antiquities

'Rediscovering Greece & Rome': Museum's newly-redisplayed gallery opens 30 January 2010

From 30 January 2010, visitors will experience The Fitzwilliam Museum's collection of Greek and Roman antiquities in a completely new light, thanks to a £950,000 gallery refurbishment.

The Greek and Roman Gallery, one of the Fitzwilliam's most popular spaces, has been the focus of an intensive eighteenth-month period of conservation, research and redisplay, during which time it has been closed to the public. The gallery had remained fundamentally unchanged since the 1960s, and the Museum's redisplay will bring this world-class collection of antiquities into the 21st century - creating a new modern setting that complements the gallery's 19th-century architecture and vastly enhancing the visitor experience with improved object display, lighting and layout.

The Fitzwilliam Museum's collection of Greek and Roman antiquities boasts superb Greek vases, sculpture, sarcophagi and figurines, as well as funerary items and everyday objects from ancient times, from dress pins to helmets. These treasures - many of them specially conserved for these displays - will receive new prominence in their completely refurbished surroundings, where less well-known areas of the collection will also be showcased.

The primary focus of the new displays is upon people - the figures who, across the centuries, have given these objects their appearance and shaped their history. New object information aims to build up an illuminating picture of the artists and craftsmen who created the works, the customers who commissioned or used them, and the collectors, restorers and conservators who have affected the way they look today.

The new gallery has been redesigned in collaboration with historians and classical archaeologists from the University of Cambridge's Classics Faculty, and reflects some of the questions that are being currently asked about the ancient world. The new display, arranged in a loosely chronological order, explores such issues as: what did people do at drinking parties? How did they relate to their gods? How did they remember the dead? The display also reveals the more recent history of the objects - how did they come to Cambridge, and what has happened to them since? A map and timeline will show gallery visitors the close relationship between the Greek and Roman worlds, giving visitors a greater sense of the time and place these objects came from.

The refurbishment itself has also uncovered some surprising finds. When museum staff removed a series of ancient stone inscriptions from one of the gallery's false wall, they discovered a 'time capsule' placed there by their predecessors who had carried out the previous gallery refurbishment in the 1960s. Within this secret hiding place - which has stayed undiscovered in the Museum for nearly 50 years - staff found an edition of the Cambridge News dated Friday 10 May 1963 and a selection of contemporary coins, alongside the names of the 1960s team, which had been carved into the cement surround.

The gallery redisplay is the first result of an ongoing research project funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council to explore and publish the Museum's Greek and Roman collection.
